Saptarishi of ideas

A new discipline of archeology of the contemporary past is emerging fast in understanding the present. This helps in comprehending the nature of modern society, besides allowing more self-awareness. Though the discipline is more concerned with relationship between culture and social behavior of persons and artifacts, objects, and places that are extinct or have fallen into ruin, understanding the present also involves interpretation of current ideas during the last sixty years or so, since the UN Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 that have shaped the policy and given direction to issues of governance.

A constellation of some of the recent ideas of rights, environment (ecology and conservation), transparency (inclusion and participation of people), sustainability, responsibility, accountability, and human development (happiness) have assumed importance. Of these, the idea of human rights is the most seminal and has taken roots that have flowered into other related ideas. Environment can be better protected if one cares for sustainability of projects, human development, and a responsible use of resources. Similarly, transparency is an offshoot of right to information and encompasses the ideas of accountability. Though the ideas appear to have flowed out of each other, yet these are independent and affect the policy formulation. These have shaped the laws, expanded the ambience of governance and planning, gave themes to civil society to pursue and implement, compelled interest of private business corporations in social responsibility, and propelled judiciary to intervene.

There is a demand and focus on the theme of devolution of power at the ground level so that the subaltern, the poor, the dispossessed, and the marginal, who are often left out of consideration by authorities to determine what is best in their interest, are not only represented in the grass roots decision making, but are also made to feel part of governance. These ideas, in their realm, are affecting technology, scientific research, experimentation in governance, and focusing on problems for solutions to emerge. These would improve level of outcomes, delivery of services, and affect expending of resources on human development so that growth is sustainable and continuing.

The activities of TI India flow out of these ideas in one form or the other. These have a strong ideological base.
